There have been many ways that problems have been solved. Whether by individuals, who seek to make the world a better place, or by governments, whose job is to make the world a better place. Both have been able to solve problems.

Individuals who want to help out, sometimes organize others, and work together to solve problems. Individuals are better because they've either experienced these problems, or they can target specific problems. People doing things themselves is better for specific problems, but cannot fix large scale problems.

Governments can organize large scale projects easily. They both have time to see it through, and the resources to put it together. It may seem like governments can solve all the problems, but they can only get rid of the biggest problems, and don't know about the smaller problems.

Some choose to see the government as some powerful group, while others

See it as strong individuals working together. Looking at it this way shows that they can do a lot, if they try hard, and put a lot of effort into it. They can figure out what problems need to be solved, but may not know the best way to solve it.

If governments and individual organizations worked together, they could get more done faster and better. The governments could arrange projects, while individuals support that project, and input ideas as well. Each group has their own strengths and weaknesses, but together, they can be stronger.
